MIDDLEBURY COLLEGE SESQUICENTENNIAL 1800-1950

For general physical development, and for the building of those qualities of perseverence, endurance, physical and moral courage, sportsmanship and many others, there is no training more valuable than that which is derived from competitive athletics. To most men, competitive athletics of a highly skilled nature, as is required in intercollegiate athletics, is beyond their level of ability.

Intramural athletics provides the opportunities for all students to enjoy the experience of friendly rivalry and competition in sports. Young men need such a program to satisfy their interests, desires, and urges. The desire to compete against others is one of the students' basic drives.

Middlebury College recognizes the great need for developing a strong program of intramural athletics. With the facilities of the new World War II Memorial Field House and Gymnasium now available to students, and the Fred D. Lang Memorial Intramural Field in the near future, a strong program of intramural athletics is being initiated at the College under the guidance of John J. Kelly, '31, who in postwar years has done a good job in developing the intramural program despite the handicaps of limited space.

The "athletics for all" philosophy pays large dividends. The Middlebury Intramural program will bring pleasure to the alumni who hold that fun and exercise for the average student rather than championship ability for a relatively few specialists is rightly the primary objective in college athletics. The Middlebury program when completely reorganized will contribute a great deal to the morale of the men students. Their study habits will be improved and qualities of leadership developed in the large number of men who will share in the organizing of teams and in planning for the activities which lie ahead.

The intramural program is being organized to provide opportunities for every male student to find a sport of his own interest. Mr. Kelly will attempt to show the students that in playing the game, one learns to win and lose, to give and take, and, last but not least, to fit in with the team.

The program is particularly designed to provide a variety of recreational activities that will occupy the students' leisure time, and also develop skills that can be carried over into later life.

Every student will be encouraged to take advantage of all facilities and to participate in as many sports as his interest, ability, and time will permit. Students will be urged to use the facilities to the fullest while the College is carrying forward plans to expand them as the importance of the program justifies.

The success of an intramural sports program is largely dependent on the organization behind it. The proposed plan to be followed at Middlebury College is one which allows the students to carry most of the responsibility. Directly in charge of the program is the director of Intramural Sports, Mr. Kelly, Assistant Professor of Physical Education. His duties involve the setting up of policies, scheduling of activities assuring maximum use of facilities, meeting with student leaders to suggest and advise ways and means of stimulating interest, providing opportunities to learn new facilities, and providing the incentive for students to participate in a well-balanced program of team sports, individual sports, and recreational activities.

Under the provisions of Mr. Kelly's plan, the students will be divided into ten major units of competition and compete for an all-year sports championship based on a point system of scoring. Each of these divisions has an athletic committee. They are responsible for maintaining enthusiasm and spirit in their division. They see that teams are formed for each league sport. Their leadership is the most influential factor in making their division a strong unit of competition.

A well balanced program of activities is essential for success in intramural athletics. Middlebury's program will offer a total of ten teams and five individual sports during the year. New sports will be added whenever sufficient interest is shown. One or more sports are in operation throughout the whole school year. Activities offered include: badminton, basketball, touch football, golf, softball, tennis, track, volleyball, hockey and skiing.

One of the special features of the program is to provide free instruction in a number of activities. Only through proper instructions can students develop interest in new sports and improve the playing interest in new sports and improve the playing ability in those previously learned. Regular instruction is now being provided in [Continued on page 19]

Charles Baker Wright Scholarships Established

Two scholarships have been established in memory of Charles Baker Wright, former Dean at Middlebury College and English Professor for thirty-five years. According to an announcement made here today by Dr. Samuel S. Stratton, president of the college, a gift of $50,000 makes possible the granting of two full tuition scholarships annually to deserving students "in the name of Dr. Wright, beloved by several generations of Middlebury students."

Dr. Wright held the chair of Rhetoric and English Literature at Middlebury College from 1885 until retiring from active teaching in 1920. He lived here as Professor Emeritus until his death in 1942. In 1918 he served as acting president of the College. He was the author of several books.

According to the terms of the gift, the awards—to be made to a man and a woman for their senior year—are to be based on two and one-half years of college work and general qualifications demonstrated during that period. In addition to the usual criteria in making scholarship awards, such as outstanding character, scholarship and citizenship, the need of students will be given special consideration. To be eligible, a student must have partially earned his way during the first two and one-half years of his college course, or because of some emergency, needs help to complete his college course.

The Charles Baker Wright scholarship awards will be made each year by a committee consisting of the President of the College, the Dean of Men, the Dean of Women, and the Social Director.

Awards will be made in the spring of 1950 so that the first recipients will be able to study under the terms of the scholarships during the 1950–51 academic year.

Many Members of 1949 Class Doing Post-Graduate Work

A recent survey shows that in addition to its distinction as the largest class ever graduated from Middlebury, the class of 1949 has one of the largest groups to go directly from Middlebury into post-graduate study. Approximately four times as many men as women have reported that they were enrolled in courses in December, 1949, and one reason for this difference probably lies in the fact that most of the veterans who received A.B. degrees last June are still eligible for further aid under the G.I. Training Program. The following list has been compiled on the basis of reports received at the Alumni and Alumnae Offices.

Harvard and Middlebury head the list of colleges and universities with the greatest number of members of the Class of 1949. Those at Harvard University are Robert F. Harris, Donald H. Henderson, Herbert Manell, Richard Tuttle, Robert B. Corcoran, Edwin M. Kania, Donald B. Stillman, and G. Richard Westin, while continuing their studies at Middlebury are Alan E. Erickson, Howard K. Boone, Anthony V. Fraioli, Charles F. Hall, Edward T. Hutchinson, E. Leighton Hutchinson, William R. Niederauer, and Robert M. Parker.

Columbia students with Middlebury AB's include Henry Bloch, Jr., Leon Groisser, Peter J. Cassimatis, Philip G. Hull, and Dimitri Sazonoff. At Yale are Philip G. Deane, Charles A. James, and Laurence C. Thompson.

Frank C. Colcord, Jr., Thomas E. Duff and Willard H. Galvin are attending the Maxwell Graduate School of Syracuse University. Those attending the University of Michigan are James A. Gilbert, Arthur S. Johnson, III, and Ralph W. Larson.

At the University of Pennsylvania are Robert S. Goell, Walter T. Savage and John Selivonchik. Gedeon LaCroix and Beatrice Oetjen are studying at Wayne University in Detroit. Norman E. Joslin and Paul A. Skudder are at Cornell.

Among those who have gone West are James A. Barlow, Jr., at the University of Wyoming, John F. Bours at the University of Southern California, Norman L. Smith at U.C.L.A., Gerald W. Elbers at Minnesota University, William H. Von Dreele, Jr., at Washington University, and Lois Kemp at Denver University.

Others include Christian S. Schreiber at New York University, Theodore H. Fairbanks at the University of Delaware and James R. Nugent at the Georgetown Medical School. Those who have chosen institutions in New England are Lawrence Vadnais at Boston College, Sebastian S. Cocola at the Bentley School of Accounting and Finance, William H. Goldthwaite at the University of New Hampshire, Charles W. Muller at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy of Tufts College, and Alan F. Jakeman at the University of Vermont.

Alumni and friends of the College are invited to attend dinners in other cities. For details write to Edgar J. Wiley, Director, Alumni Relations, Middlebury, Vermont.

Cooperstein are at Boston University. Beverly Dutton is at the Nursery Training School of B.U. Margery Johnson and Betty Linsley are at Clark University, and Mary Ashworth is at Wellesley.

Attending institutions outside the United States are John H. Valentine at McGill University, Dixon F. Hemphill at the University of Stockholm, and Lynn L. Moore at Courtland Institute, University of London.

Studying for the ministry are Leon Adkins at Boston University Theological School, Harold Richardson at Princeton Theological Seminary, and Morton Y. Sand at Andover Newton Theological School.

Those continuing their studies on the special M.I.T. Plan are Robert G. Hunt, Charles P. Puksta, Olaf D. Remmler, Robert D. Brown, Frederick McGarry and Robert P. Whittier.

Barbara Fraleigh is at the Perkins Institute and Mass. School for the Blind. Jean Scroggie is at the Richmond Professional Institute of William and Mary. Jane Talmage is a student at the Tobe Coburn School for Fashion Careers.

The women who have reported that they are attending secretarial school are Elizabeth J. Bigelow, Helen E. Kline, Joan K. Linenthal, and Cynthia J. Mallory at Katharine Gibbs School, Virginia W. Duffy at Pierce Secretarial School, Jane A. Miller at Carlisle Commercial College, and Patricia Riley at Interboro Institute.

Prizes Offered For Best Letters Stating

"What Middlebury College Means To Me"

Alumni and Alumnae are invited by the NEWS LETTER to participate in a contest seeking the best letter of not more than 600 words stating "What Middlebury College Means To Me."

All letters entered in the contest must be mailed and postmarked prior to midnight March 1, 1950. Winners of first, second and third prizes will be published in the April issue of the NEWS LETTER.

This contest is limited to former students of Middlebury, who are not at present in the employ of the College.

The Prizes

FIRST PRIZE, a set of one dozen Middlebury College Wedgwood Plates valued at $24.00. A choice of scenes includes Bread Loaf, Chateau, Forest Hall, Mead Memorial Chapel, Old Chapel, Painter Hall, and Pearsons Hall. Two new plates with views of Munroe and Gifford Halls are in production and delivery is expected from England in three weeks. These plates may be considered in the First Prize selection along with a plate containing a view of the World War II Memorial Field House which will be available sometime in early August, 1950.

SECOND PRIZE, A set of eight plates selected from the above list.

THIRD PRIZE, A copy of the Sesquicentennial issue of the General Catalogue (note description of this book inside back cover), or a set of six plates.

The Board of Judges will consist of Edgar J. Wiley, Director of Alumni Relations; Barbara A. Wells, Alumnae Secretary; and the Editor of the NEWS LETTER.

Robert Rauner '50 Wins Dutton Fellowship Award

President Samuel S. Stratton announced recently that Robert M. Rauner, '50, has been selected as the recipient for the Annual Dutton Fellowship award which provides for a year's post-graduate study at an approved institution in an English speaking country outside the United States or in France or the Netherlands.

The basis for the award is similar to that of the Rhodes Scholarships, high standing being considered in connection with college leadership and interest in outdoor sports and life. The Dutton Fellowship, established in 1926 by the Honorable Redfield Proctor, former Governor of Vermont and a member of the Middlebury board of trustees, provides $2500 to be awarded to a man in the graduating class selected by the college scholarship committee.

Rauner, a senior, has an 88.23 percent academic average at Middlebury. He served for thirty-three months in the Pacific during World War II with the U. S. Marine Corps. Upon a year's study at the London School of Economics he will return to this country to continue work on a doctorate in preparation for teaching Political Economy.

Panthers To Play Eight Football Games Next Fall

Middlebury College will renew football relations with St. Lawrence and Wesleyan Universities, and six of the seven rivals that the Panthers faced during the fall of 1949.

St. Lawrence will replace Bates on the new schedule, while Wesleyan will be the season's opener on Sept. 30th, during Homecoming Weekend.

The schedule: Sept. 30, Wesleyan; Oct. 7, Hamilton at Clinton, N. Y.; Oct. 14, St. Lawrence at Canton, N. Y.; Oct. 21, Tufts; Oct. 28, Trinity; Nov. 4, Norwich; Nov. 11, Union at Schenectady, N. Y.; and Nov. 18, Vermont at Burlington.

*Top, first team, 1919, members were left to right: Front, *E. D. Drost, '24, and A. F. Gollnick, '22; center, C. W. Parker, '20, J. W. Mead, '21, Stewart Ross, '20 (Captain), R. E. Dake, '20, and E. V. Good, '20; rear, Coach A. M. Brown, Assistant Coach R. L. Fisher, '10, H. E. Brown, '22, D. J. Breen, '20, B. F. Potratz, '23, E. S. Kalin, '23, and G. H. Woodward, '20 (Manager). Bottom, 1949 reunion picture (including second team members and former President John M. Thomas). Left to right: Kneeling, C. W. Parker, '20, and Dr. Stewart Ross, '20; standing, G. H. Cabot, '22; E. V. Good, '20; H. E. Brown, '22; Coach A. M. Brown; Dr. John M. Thomas, '90; E. F. Stockwell, '22; B. F. Potratz, '22; and F. C. Brigham, '21. (deceased)

The members of the 1919 football team, winners of the Vermont Conference football championship thirty years ago, were the invited guests of the College at the 1949 Vermont-Middlebury game this fall. Eight former Panther stars watched Middlebury win its third consecutive Conference championship by defeating the University of Vermont by a 14 to 6 score.

The 1919 team was coached by Arthur M. Brown, assisted by R. L. Fisher, '10, later an American League baseball pitcher, who has been for many years baseball coach and Supervisor of Athletics at the University of Michigan. An interesting feature of the Middlebury-Vermont game of thirty years ago was the trip made to Middlebury by the All-American player, Dr. George R. ("Dud") Drake, '02, who left a busy medical practice in Pennsylvania to help inspire the Panthers on to victory. Dr. Drake, after a highly successful medical career, died in Plymouth, Pa. on Oct. 15, 1934.

REPORTING THE STUDENT SIDE OF MIDDLEBURY NEWS

By Paul O. Smith '51

On Baking . . .

Good education is like a good cake—it takes just the right amount of just the right ingredients.

In vocational schools, vocational in the broad sense of highly specialized training in any field, individuality as an ingredient is subordinated to formalized classroom and lab work, and the resultant graduate is a highly skilled, technically efficient, intellectual plumber—sort of a flat cake with a sharp taste.

In the liberal arts school the individual becomes the important ingredient, and training him to think for himself, to act as a responsible citizen in society, is the very goal of the institution. Classwork and lectures, then, become functional, a means to an end, the independent, logical, and responsible thinking person.

Student responsibility at Middlebury is a growing thing. It is growing despite obstacles of intellectual inertia, and at the expense of people's toes sometimes. But it is growing.

On Cutting . . .

Formal consideration of a revision of the cut system at the College began last spring in regular faculty meetings with certain members expressing beliefs that excessive cutting of classes was seriously detrimental to academic achievement. Despite a stream of rumors running through the undergraduate grapevine, no decisive action on the matter is apparently in the immediate prospect to handle this question which is uppermost in each student's mind.

Student opinion is definitely opposed to stiffer attendance requirements. At a recent meeting of the Student and Faculty Educational Policy Committees the student committee stated their belief that a further liberalization of the cut system would encourage adoption of a more mature attitude toward academic responsibilities by a majority of the students.

An informal survey by this Commentator reveals that only a minority of the 1200 Middlebury students are abusing the cut privileges and these chronic absentees are in many instances the marginal students. Therefore, the students feel these marginal cases are mainly being cited as the cases in point by those who favor revision of the system.

At a Student-Administration Meeting in December students asserted that in some cases, responsibility for absenteeism devolves upon a few instructors, who through carelessness in preparation, incompetence, or other defects fail to deliver lectures which are worthy of regular class attendance. Through a process of natural selection, the most rewarding classes are usually the most regularly attended. Any revision of the cut system cannot correct the shortcomings of certain faculty members.

Both sides feel that the job of the College is to foster maturity of judgment and purpose in its students. Some of the faculty believe that students should be allowed all the liberty in class attendance which their maturity and discretion merit. "But when a student deliberately absents himself frequently from a good class, and consequently does work inferior to that which he is capable of, the burden of proof is on the students that he is making a wise choice." Some of the faculty even feel "that, in loco parentis, the College should protect students from the temptation of unwise cutting until such time as maturity of discretion has really been acquired." Paradoxically, some freshmen merit unlimited cut privileges on this basis more than some seniors. No arbitrary rule can apply to all students with equal wisdom. However, the students believe that despite imperfections in the present cut system, it is a workable compromise. They maintain that further restrictions on class attendance would threaten a self-defeating shift in class emphasis from maturity to discipline. Any decision will markedly affect Middlebury's educational policy inasmuch as attendance requirements are tacit criteria of the college's attitude toward its students.

Paul O. Smith, '51

. . . who takes over the duties of campus commentator with this issue, writes from experience when he discusses the "variety of ingredients" essential to a liberal education. An economic major, he has branched out into a wide range of extracurricular interests.

On Pointing Straws . . .

Student interest in the curriculum, too, is another manifestation of this "responsibility" movement. It is a matter of increasing concern among them what courses are offered and who will teach them. Even the educational philosophy of the College has come in for its share of discussion, criticism, and defense. And it is no mere accident that a professor who is known to teach the most intensive and difficult courses in the College, and who is known as perhaps the toughest grader on the faculty, is also one of the most respected and popular teachers.

President Samuel S. Stratton has inaugurated a series of periodic meetings with the student leaders of the College. This meeting of the President with what might well be termed a "Student Congress," gives each and every student a chance to voice his or her opinion in a constructive way, and students with complaints a chance to voice them to their satisfaction.

This movement of Dr. Stratton's to seek the student viewpoint is not initiating a new philosophy. There is no violent upheaval on the campus, no parading, no soap box speeches. It is evolutionary, not revolutionary. It is quietly asking a simple question: "If we are being trained to think for ourselves and assume responsibilities, what, then, do we think?"

The Alumni Fund is Off to a Good Start

The annual giving program of Middlebury College was started on Dec. 1, and as of Jan. 4th $5,730.00 has been subscribed to the 1949–50 Fund. Although the principal emphasis is on the central idea of something from everyone in accordance with the means of the individual—anything from one dollar up—the gifts already received average $17.57 per individual. The minimum goal for this year set by the Executive Committee and approved by the Alumni and Alumnae Councils at their Homecoming meetings is $15,000. The current campaign closes on May 31st.

Comments accompanying some of the early contributions are especially significant and gratifying. They indicate that the annual giving idea is meeting with a hearty response from people in varying financial situations. The following came from a very recent graduate with a new baby, a new job and just getting established in a new home with his Middlebury alumna wife—"I think the 'living endowment' fund is a great idea, and I would not have sent this small contribution ($4.00) if I had not been convinced, by the recent brochure, that small contributions can count." Accompanying a check for $100.00, as a contribution from his wife and himself who graduated in the 20's and are now well established, was the following comment: "It's a real pleasure to be able to do this! Midd. took a chance on me when no one else would! Wish I could make it more!"

Middlebury Alumni made an enviable showing in the Memorial Fund campaign completed on June 30, 1949, by contributing $261,673.52 as their part of the grand total of $405,366.22 which included contributions from friends of the College.

Class pride and loyalty were stirred considerably when the list of contributors by classes was published in the supplement to the News Letter of July 1949, and the standing by classes in per cent of members contributing was made known. The class of 1918 led the list with 73.5% of its members participating in the Memorial Fund. 1910 ranked 2nd with 68.9%, 1902 was 3rd with 66.7%, 1911 was 4th with 63.8%, and 1920 stood in 5th place with 61.6%. Other classes ranged down to 40.7% registered by the class that stood in 51st place. 49.6% of all alumni and former students of the College contributed to the Memorial Fund which is well above the average of annual participation in colleges which are members of the American Alumni Council. At the time of the completion of the Memorial Fund, 3292 out of a total of 6636 Alumni, Alumnae and former students had participated.

The Memorial Fund was a building campaign and required relatively large contributions from individual donors to achieve worthwhile results and the average gift from Middlebury people was approximately $79.

Under the annual giving plan where one dollar or more is a welcome contributon and the chief idea is participation by the greatest possible number, it seems reasonable for the Committee to expect even a much higher per cent of participation in the annual giving program with the consequent feeling of proprietary interest in the College on the part of a great number of its constituency. Fifty-two men and fifty-two women have signed up as Class Fund Chairmen with the responsibility for seeing that members of their classes are made aware of the challenge that their class groups are facing as a test of class interest and loyalty in the per cent of members contributing to the Fund of 1949–50.

While only a preliminary and very tentative tabulation of class showing can be made at this time, the five classes which rank at the top of the list in this respect in the new Fund program are: (1) 1903, (2) 1901, (3) 1906, (4) 1902, (5) 1904. The Committee plans to publish an acknowledgment of all contributions received up to March 15 in the April issue of the News Letter by listing the names without the amounts contributed by the members of the various classes who are participating in the Annual Fund program.

From present indications the Middlebury plan for annual giving is going to prove to be a substantial source of current income which should become a dependable item in the annual budget of the College. This year's "living endowment" earmarked for scholarship aid will go a long way toward meeting the serious threat to Middlebury's long-time record of aid to worthy students from homes of modest means.

What Becomes of the Emeriti?

EDGAR J. WILEY, '13, Director of Alumni Relations

ALTOGETHER too little has been heard of our emeritus professors after retirement suddenly takes them out of circulation on the Campus. It is with this thought in mind that the NEWS LETTER plans to publish reports from time to time on the retirement activities of these people who have given such a generous segment of their lives to Middlebury. As a further move in that direction the College administration plans to invite them back annually to the Campus to attend the Commencement Reunion "Barbecue" as guests of Middlebury.

Alfred M. Dame

Our roving reporter has first turned his spotlight on Alfred M. Dame who retired in 1944 after sixteen years of teaching the Classics at Middlebury. We found him at 235 Cocoanut Row in Palm Beach, Florida.

In general it may be said that his year, like "All Gaul," is divided into three parts—four months from June through September at his New Hampshire home, where his chief activities are tending his flower garden, roaming the woods, or doing odd jobs around the place. The six months from November through April he spends in Florida and the months of May and October at the shore on Cape Cod. Following the seasons about in this way he seems to be living the so-called, "Life of Riley."

Since his longest stay is in Florida it is there that his main activities lie. His chief hobbies continue to be travel, nature study, color photography, and while in Florida, swimming in the surf, which is practicable nearly everyday during the winter, about two blocks from his home.

Always an inveterate traveler, since his retirement he has taken two cruises to Guatemala, several short cruises in the West Indies (incidentally he has been to the West Indies a total of twenty-eight times!) and a two months' cruise to South America, visiting Brazil, Uruguay, Argentina and Chile, including a "marvelous" trip across South America via the Argentine and Chilean lakes, and back over the Transandine Railroad, where he photographed "some of the grandest scenery I have seen anywhere in the world." Last summer he took a fortnight's trip out west to visit the Utah and Arizona National Parks—Bryce, Zion and Grand Canyons.

Professor Dame has taken advantage of the Audubon Society's tour of the Everglades region, under the guidance of an expert naturalist, where the wild bird-life is "exceedingly fascinating"—such as colonies of Wood Ibis (numbering three or four thousand), Egrets, Great White Heron (found nowhere else in America) and Roseate Spoonbill, resembling a miniature Flamingo. These tours are conducted from Miami at regular intervals each winter, and include travel by station-wagon and boat among the keys and bays of Southern Florida. The bird life in Florida gives him an opportunity to study many species that are not to be found in New England. The bird bath and two bird feeding shelves in his back yard attract such species as the Mockingbird, the Mourning Dove, the Cardinal and the Red Bellied Woodpecker,—all rare or unknown in Vermont.

The flora of southern Florida, semi-tropical in character, afford him "endless interest," especially the palms. A friend of his in Palm Beach has forty different species of palms on his estate.

Besides walking, he has a bicycle on which he rides on a bicycle-trail that extends for about five miles along the shore of picturesque Lake Worth, shaded by cocoanut palms and closed to motor traffic. This enables him to get more intimate glimpses into the magnificent estates which a motorist cannot get.

On the cultural side, Palm Beach has proved to be a surprise to him. One generally hears about the immense wealth represented by the millionaires who make this area their winter playground but less well-known is the extensive area of modest homes of the less well-to-do—many of them retired doctors, lawyers, professors, etc., who form a congenial environment. Just around the corner from Professor Dame's home is an institution known as the "Society of the Four [Continued on page 19]

One hundred and sixty students listen to Professor Bogart lecture on the problems of their Government.

The Political Science Program at Middlebury

By WALTER T. BOGART, Head of the Political Science Department

THE Department of Political Science at Middlebury partakes of the general characteristics of the history of such departments throughout the United States. It is relatively a youngster as a separate academic discipline and, during its short lifetime, it has undergone several profound changes marking phases of the development of the systematic study of government. Besides these changes, the department program, of course, felt the impact of the recent war period and the subsequent readjustment to the new postwar conditions. Hence, one finds that the brief record of the department is one denoting almost a steady state of flux.

It was not until the academic year 1913–1914 that the Middlebury College Catalogue carried a program presented by a separate Department of Political Science. For some years prior, there had been a Department of Political and Social Sciences. This offered work in what are now the three fields of economics, political science and sociology. In that year Professor Charles F. Abbott became the first chairman of the new department, with the title of Assistant Professor of Government and Law. I point out his title particularly because it is significant of the origins of the department and typifies the early approach to the study of political institutions.

Professor Abbott had as his principal degree an LL.B. And this, too, was fairly typical of the early days of departments of political science. For the most part, law, with an emphasis on public law, was the route by which American academic institutions and scholars became sufficiently conscious of the state as an object of study to provide the groundwork for what has come to be called political science. In the old combination department one finds in the catalogue an offering of eight semester courses which dealt directly with matters of government and, of these, six were law courses. In the new department's first year nine semesters of work were offered, five being in government and four in law. A gradual but definite metamorphosis in this regard is one of the notable characteristics of the intervening thirty-six years.

PROFESSOR BOGART came to Middlebury in 1937 from Stanford University where he had been an instructor in political science. His undergraduate work was at U.C.L.A. and his M.A. and doctorate were taken at Stanford. He became chairman of the Department of Political Science at Middlebury in 1938. In 1941 he took a military leave of absence. From then until 1946 he served in the Air Force, including twenty-five months of duty overseas, being released from active duty with the grade of colonel, in which grade he now holds a reserve mobilization assignment in the Military Air Transport Service. He returned to the college in 1946 and was promoted to the rank of full professor in 1948. At present he is a member of the faculty advisory council to the President and a member of the faculty committee on conference with the trustees. The Vermont Historical Society, in conjunction with the State of Vermont, is soon to publish a book by him on the public land grants in Vermont.

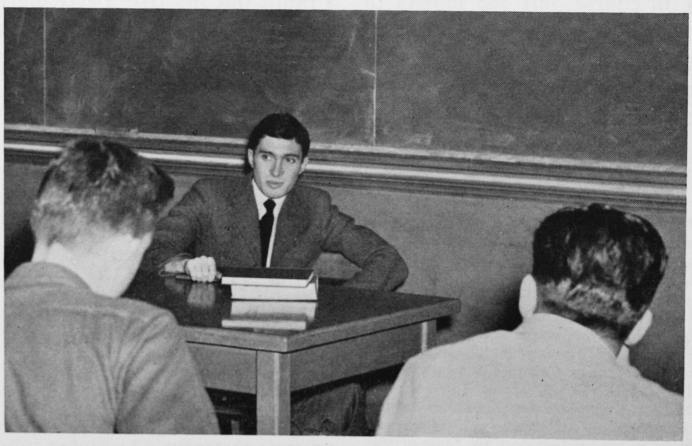
Perhaps it would be interesting to look in detail at what was then regarded as a balanced diet for those students working in the field, by contrast with later ideas. The study of general governmental affairs was attempted by no more than one semester each of English, American, European and municipal government and one semester on Elements of Political Science. On the other side of the picture there were semester courses on constitutional, international and business law and one on the Elementary Principles of Law. These were soon supported by courses on Roman Law and on Jurisprudence.

Another point of some significance is that the department did not gain full working stature at a single sweep of the pen which created it. It was not set up, either in respect to the number of courses offered or to the number of students accommodated therein, as a distinct full-time job. Professor Abbott, besides teaching the several law courses, taught for the Department of History. And, conversely, Professor Wetherell of the latter department taught some of the courses in government. It was another five years before such joint duties ceased to be a normal part of departmental arrangements, and from time to time cross-overs of personnel continued to occur for long afterwards. It is also pertinent to notice that Professor Abbott taught two short stints in the Department of Economics following the conclusion of his work in the Department of History.

Such interdepartmental personnel arrangements represented two conditions distinctive of that period, the change from which is important to understand if one is to appreciate the contrast between that time and the contemporary work being done. The first of these two factors is that although the social studies were in the process of being defined and differentiated as to their respective roles in the study of human affairs, the day was still close, and still influential, when the problems of society had been dealt with in an omnibus fashion. Thus, it was not thought to be unreasonable that a teacher should undertake to expound the material of more than one of the aspects of social study. The second factor, obviously intimately related to the first, is that the body of knowledge in the several social studies was then still so meagre as to be presented to students in relatively few courses and to offer no great strain to the teacher in his own study and familiarization with them.



Students discuss problems of American Government with Mr. Eimerl. The above group consists of sixteen students. There are other similar groups of equal size.

The great change from this situation is another of the principal characteristics of the development during the last three decades. This, of course, is not peculiar to political science, but, rather, has affected all of the social sciences. This process is one which has been generated by more than a single influence and has, consequently, made the first half of the century truly a busy time for all those who have been involved; and not least, by any means, for the scholars and teachers dealing with the problems of man and the state.

To begin with, we encounter the unfolding of the idea that mankind and its problems should receive the benefit of systematic inductive study, to supplement the earlier deductive speculation which had been the customary technique applied to such matters. Out of this idea came the terms "social science" and "political science" and the orientation of effort which they imply. There are those who, with some justification, assert that such terms are unreal; that the social studies have not attained the true status of sciences. However, much is yet to be done toward such an achievement. Nevertheless, the fact remains that students of society have undertaken the task of applying the scientific method to their work. This has required the accumulation of factual data and the emergence of techniques for its accumulation, organization and interpretation—clearly a job of huge proportions. To a considerable degree, the social scientists had to commence from a "standing start," and they have had to develop their programs of scholarly operations in a much briefer span of time than has been employed by the physical scientists. They have, in short, been men in a hurry.

To complicate their task, the same period has been one of a tremendous acceleration in the pace of human affairs and the urgency of solutions for human problems. All of you, I imagine, are only too clearly aware of the appalling rate at which your own individual and family problems increase in complexity and seriousness, from year to year and even from day to day. So we see the fledgling social sciences confronted by a rapidly increasing mass of material with which to cope, as well as an equally increasing demand that they produce solutions, or at least proposals for solutions. The result, just as in other areas of intellectual effort, has been an absolute necessity for more and more specialization of scholarly study and even a considerable amount of specialization in the teaching of the social sciences, if advantage were to be taken of the ever wider horizons of understanding of human affairs.

Consequently, we find, as the recent decades pass in review, first a more distinct differentiation between the functions of the several social sciences and, then, a tendency toward specialization within each of the major fields. This entire movement is often decried—one of the familiar pronouncements against it having been to the effect that scholars are coming to know more and more about less and less. And, insofar as the movement represents any breaking down of appreciation of the ultimate fact that man is not a compartmented creature, but is a whole, rounded, complex unity, it is most unfortunate. Obviously, solutions to human problems which are posed from no more than a limited arc of the whole circle of man's life can have only limited value. But, the movement toward specialization must be recognized as an inevitable response to the fact that the social studies have long since progressed so far that thorough handling of more than a part of the available material is beyond the capacity of the individual scholar or teacher.

Middlebury's Department of Political Science has reacted to this problem much as have similar departments elsewhere. One can follow the process of adjustment through the annual issues of the catalogue as the changes in department personnel and courses appear. A closer, "behind the scenes" reading of course descriptions shows, too, that the department has gone through the several phases which have led to the present conception of the field of political science: first, the rather unbalanced early stage with its legalistic emphasis; next, a phase when descriptive study and teaching prevailed, together with a preoccupation with the structural features of government; and, more recently, a dominant interest in the functional problems of political institutions and a stride forward beyond mere description to a level of analysis and interpretation of the data.

A detailed display of the variations in course offerings would be too lengthy and would be somewhat pointless here. A few examples, or illustrations, will serve better, I believe, to demonstrate the general nature of the growth of the department. One discovers, for instance, that there has been, throughout the period under consideration, an increase in the number of courses offered as material became available for more adequate investigation of the state and its phenomena. Whereas the department in its first year offered nine semesters of work, the current catalogue presents an offering of twenty semesters, altogether. [Continued on page 19]

"... Middlebury College's Snow Bowl is the Best ..."

By Frank Elkins,
Ski Editor of the New York Times

High in the snow-covered Green Mountain of Vermont, and at the foot of Bread Loaf Mountain is situated the Middlebury College Snow Bowl, one of the most compact and comprehensive collegiate ski layouts in the country. Confined within Battell Park, bordered with Norwegian spruce and located in a natural snow pocket in a corner of Vermont where the snows come frequently and remain long, the Bowl contains just about everything that a skier would enjoy, and is only twenty minutes from the main Middlebury academic campus located in the Champlain Valley overlooking the picturesque town of Middlebury.

There are three rope tows serving open slopes with an appeal to the beginner and expert, a towering fifty-meter jump designed along the style of the Olympic Hill at Lake Placid, a 2,000-foot slalom course, a mile-and-an-eighth championship downhill descent, an excellent eight-mile cross-country trail for competition. Adjacent to the Bowl there are endless miles of old logging

During the past twenty years Mr. Elkins has helped considerably in promoting the growth of skiing throughout the United States. In his capacity as Ski Editor of the New York Times he has covered ski events all over the world and on fifteen different occasions Mr. Elkins has covered Middlebury Winter Carnival for the Times. He is the author of several winter sport articles and three books on skiing. His latest publication, the World Ski Book, is the most all-inclusive book on skiing ever published.

roads through scenic countryside for touring.

To the above, modern shelter where healthy appetites will find wholesome food, a ski school under the direction of Joe Jones, former Tenth Mountain Division ski trooper and now manager of the Bowl, plus good transportation from town to the Bowl for students alumni and visitors and you've got a project that might very well be the envy of many highly-rated commercial ski establishments.

The enthusiasm for skiing at Middlebury, which has held winter carnivals for the past eighteen years, is reflected in the fact that a large percentage of the undergraduates, both men and women possess their own skis, and made good use of them on the Snow Bowl slopes.

With such enthusiasm for the sport from a recreational point at Middlebury College, it is little wonder that champions develop therefrom. Thus, Middlebury's sons and daughters have earned National and intercollegiate honors on the slopes and trails from Aspen, Col., and Sun Valley to the lofty hills of New England. From all parts of the United States students are now coming to Middlebury, for the name of its academic standing and skiing facilities have spread wide.

Middlebury is in no sense a country college, but it sure takes advantage of being a college in the country, with students making full use of Middlebury's natural facilities which include the school's mountain campus with its picturesque 13,000 acres of woodlands and forests.

Over three-quarters of a century ago a narrow post road crossed the Green Mountains by way of Bread Loaf, one of the wildest and most picturesque passes in Vermont. The region, located fifteen hundred feet above sea level, appealed to a wealthy Middlebury citizen, Joseph Battell, who, in 1866, purchased the principal farmhouse in the clearing where Middlebury College's nationally known Bread Loaf School of English is now situated, and a four miles distance from the location of the College's Snow Bowl. To protect the forest area from lumbermen who were advancing year by years into the mountains, he bought at a few cents an acre, many miles of forest land surrounding the clearing.

At the time of Mr. Battell's death in 1915, Bread Loaf had become a sizeable community and his holdings included 40,000 acres of forest land. The settlement, and 30,000 acres of land including some of the highest mountain peaks in Vermont, were left to Middlebury College, and in 1920 the community which sprung up around Mr. Battell's farmhouse was selected as the site for a summer school of English. The 30,000 acres due to the sale of land for one reason or another. An example of how the sale of this land helped the College is shown in the building of one of the handsomest women's dormitories in the East, from the proceeds of the sale of tract of the Battell forest land which was sold to the Federal Government for a national forest. This building was constructed in 1936 of gray limestone and was named Forest Hall.

Middlebury College is doing a good job in carrying out the aims of President Samuel S. Stratton who believes that "the function of a College is to produce young men and women who will become responsible citizens and intellectual leaders in their own communities.

"To this end," Dr. Stratton says, "Middlebury aims to give its students every opportunity to build up the body, to train the mind, to kindle the imagination, to discipline the emotions, to strengthen the will, to cultivate conscience.

"It introduces the young man and woman to the classroom, library, laboratory, [Continued on page 20]

McCullough Gymnasium Carries On

By MARY S. ROSEVEAR, Head of the Women's Physical Education Department

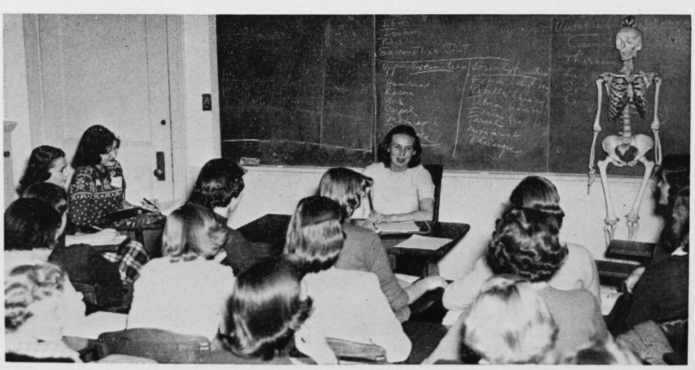
WHEN I was asked by the Administration whether I would be in favor of using McCullough Gymnasium for the women of Middlebury College rather than having them share the new Memorial Field House, then in the construction stage, I replied, "This is exactly what I had hoped would happen, and nothing could be better for everyone concerned." Now this plan has become a reality, and I wish that I could personally conduct each alumnus and alumna through the building. To some of you this may be one more reason to come back to Middlebury.

Miss Rosevear discusses plans for the second semester program of the Women's Athletic Association with Lois J. Rapp, president of the student organization.

McCullough Gymnasium was dedicated in June 1912 and the originator of the building fund was the Honorable John Griffith McCullough, for fifteen years a trustee of Middlebury. The College will celebrate its Sesquicentennial Anniversary this year and the McCullough Gymnasium for 37 of the College's 150 years has played a very important part in the promotion of the health of several generations of students, and today stands ready to continue its important role in the years ahead.

The McCullough Gymnasium, which has served the students so long and so well, has had no major changes but has been painted and renovated from top to bottom. The gym proper has had its "face lifted" with entirely new wainscoting. New window glass and freshly-painted, weather-tight window frames make the lot of basketball scorers and timers much happier. There was not time to work on the floor, but this will be done in the future. The temporary offices on the stage have been removed, making the stage usable and allowing more light to reach the gym floor. The old offices of Coach Brown and Red Kelly have gone feminine in both color and contents. One is now lime green with blond maple furniture and the other Chinese blue.

Probably the greatest transformation has taken place in the old girls' dressing room. Do you remember the room on the landing which was the only spot in the building that women could call their own? It is now the Women's Athletic Association room where the Council meets and other W.A.A. members can entertain at tea faculty members and visiting Play Day teams. This room has been furnished in wheat finish pieces, upholstered in gray, black and yellow, or plain gray. The walls are a lovely shade of blue-green, curtains are yellow, and a large gray rug covers the floor. A partition divides this room from the kitchenette where a two-plate electric stove, a sink, and cupboards make possible the serving of light refreshments. For the china we have chosen Fiesta Ware in aqua, cream, and yellow, and the pattern of the silver is Roger's "Exquisite." For the china, the rug, the lamp and several other pieces of furniture, we are deeply indebted to the Associate Alumnae whose generosity made them possible.



Miss Slevin leading a discussion on Hygiene.

Downstairs, Doc Farrell's former headquarters have become a very good classroom with cheerful yellow walls and gray cupboards. Sixteen dressing booths and a long mirror have been added to the locker room where each girl now has her own individual locker. Shoulder showers as well as overhead ones are provided, and a large drier now cares for any and all "wet" heads.

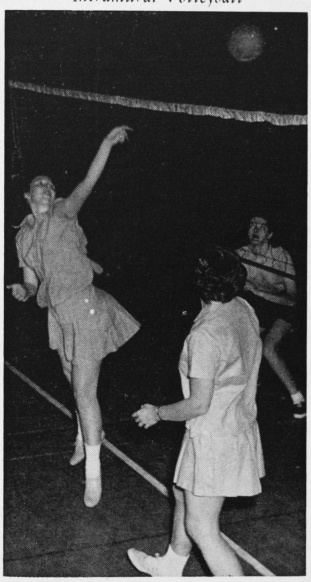
Down the long corridor to the old equipment room, one finds another cheerful yellow-walled room with radiant heat where Freshmen are given their posture examinations and any remedial work can be done. Here are also found stall bars, mats, and a beautiful mirror.

The inner handball court has been made into a dance studio with several mirrors, and a piano. The Dance Group, Dance Club and other small classes meet here. The other court is now a squash court, and this sport has been added to the department and W.A.A. programs. This squash court is also used for classes in coaching and recreational leadership, and is a place where tennis enthusiasts can keep up their practice during the winter season.

But there are more changes to be considered in addition to these physical ones. More important is the availability of the gym at all times for classes and sports activities. Instead of having three hours per week for intramurals during the indoor season, we now have every afternoon and evening. Instead of being forced to go to other colleges for indoor Play Days we can now invite them here. Last year we traveled to Russell Sage, Skidmore, the University of Vermont, and Green Mountain Junior College, taking on each trip a different class intramural team to compete with Vassar, Albany State Teachers, McGill, the University of Rochester, and Cortland State Teachers College, to mention a few of those attending these play days. This year we hope to have some of the same schools come here.

Intramural Volleyball



Mention should be made here of the many changes which have taken place in the Play Day idea. Twenty years ago many of you took part in play days with other colleges, but you never felt satisfied with the results or with the actual playing of the games because teamwork was lacking. This condition existed because each team was composed of half of one college, and half of another. Consequently, these girls had never played together as a team. Today we play teams made up from one college. Here at Middlebury the intramural teams are used. This fall we invited Russell Sage, Skidmore, St. Lawrence, and the University of Vermont to a Hockey Play Day. This

WMCRS Is On The Air

WMCRS, the student-managed and operated radio station now provides undergraduates and faculty with entertaining and informative programs on a daily broadcasting schedule. With 11 watts of power and operating on a frequency of 750 kilocycles, the station resumed broadcasting on December 5, on a carrier current system employing the college bell lines. New studios and additional equipment marked the reopening of the station whose establishment was pioneered last spring by John W. Bowker, '52 and Laurence R. Draper, '52. From modest beginnings last May, when broadcasting facilities were housed in a converted chicken coop, WMCRS has moved to newly constructed studios in the basement of the Student Union. Equipment has increased until it now includes four microphones, two turntables, a speech amplifier, an input amplifier, and a new transmitter containing crystals.

WMCRS began broadcasting last May 1st and continued to the closing of classes. Laurence R. Draper, program director, set up a broadcasting schedule on a five-day week basis, with six and one-half hours of programs each day. Sponsors for commercial programs were secured under the direction of Stuart M. Briggs, '51, advertising manager. Commercial copy designed to sell merchant's wares to students was prepared by the staff. The initial broadcast included interviews with well known Conference speakers, and bandleader Charlie Barnet was interviewed May 12th by disc jockeys Sidney Kay and Alan Gussow. In six short weeks of broadcasting WMCRS became an important part of campus activity.

The staff was not idle during the summer months. Chief Engineer John Bowker worked on improving technical equipment, and each staff member studied methods of improving his particular phase of the broadcasting operation. An obstacle to the future of the station appeared during the summer in the form of a docket before the Federal Communications Commission which would restrict all college radio stations from regular broadcasting bands. Through letters to the FCC by its president, James W. Kitchell, '51, the staff of WMCRS voiced its opposition to any such restriction. Letters expressing approval of well-organized campus radio stations were sent to the Commission by President Samuel S. Stratton. With the appearance on the scene of other jurisdictional problems, the FCC has apparently tabled the matter temporarily. Realizing that presentation of the proposed ruling stemmed largely from the present lack of organization of college radio stations, the staff of WMCRS has taken steps to maintain high standards of procedure. They believe that self-regulation on the part of college stations will make any FCC restrictions unnecessary.

News commentator James W. Kitchell '51 gives an early morning review of campus activities.

Twelve and one half hours of programs are presented on week days, with somewhat abbreviated schedules on Saturday and Sunday. Remote broadcasts are being made from the Student Union lounges and snack bar, and sport contests are aired from the Field [Continued on page 21] badminton, tennis, baseball, track and volleyball. Instruction in other sports will be added whenever facilities and weather permit. Instructors for the various activities are, in many instances, in the past and future, volunteer students. They are interested in promoting their favorite sport and do an excellent job. These instructors are outstanding performers in the activity and they are able to give practically individual attention to their pupils. "By regular attendance in these sport classes and regular periods, anyone can become very proficient in the activity," says Mr. Kelly. And there is the added satisfaction of keeping in good physical condition, the enjoyment of the sport, and the pleasure of participating with others who have the same common interest.

Today Intramural Athletics forms a most significant feature of the physical education program at Middlebury College.

Arts," which forms one of the cultural centers of the Palm Beaches. It consists of a library building set in an attractively landscaped garden, where one may take out books or browse in the comfortable reading-rooms or in the garden, an auditorium, approached by a stately avenue of Royal Palms, in which a course of weekly lectures or concerts is given during the winter season, and an art gallery in which loan exhibits of paintings and sculpture and social gatherings are held each month. Membership in this organization, at a moderate fee, enables one to meet many congenial people from all over the country.

Palm Beach draws many notables so our retired professor unexpectedly runs across such people as Lily Pons, the Duchess of Windsor, Herbert Hoover, Sumner Welles, Drew Pearson and H. V. Kaltenborn (whose son, by the way, is his next-door neighbor). He is intrigued with the sight of many beautiful private yachts moored along the lake front, among them the famous Chinese junk owned by the late "Believe it or not Ripley," who had a fine estate on the water front.

On the quieter side, he continues his reading of Greek, talks occasionally with Mr. and Mrs. Durward Yates ('22 and '23) about Middlebury and its doings and now and then he is called upon to show his pictures to small groups.

"All in all," he says, "I am thoroughly enjoying my retirement and find plenty of things to hold my interest."

It was noted earlier that the department's first offering was split nearly evenly between courses in government and courses in law. In fact, for the first two years the catalogue was printed so as to make a definite distinction between the two branches of the department's courses. Now, there is but one year of work referred to as a law course—constitutional law—and the course description makes clear and plain that the course is essentially a study of American governmental institutions through the medium of Supreme Court decisions and the circumstances surrounding them. (It is sometimes informally described as an advanced course in American government.) Even within the first decade, Professor Abbott had made impressive progress in this direction to a point where, out of a total of fourteen semesters, no more than three were labled as law courses and, not too long afterward, one of these was revised from International Law to International Law and Relations and this, in turn, at a later day, became International Government. The remaining two semesters—business law—were put in brackets in the catalogue in 1939 and no longer taught after that and were dropped from the catalogue entirely during the '40s.

Another significant example is found in the teaching of American government. You will recall that in the first year the department covered the subject in one semester. It should further be realized that this was not the initial, or opening, course in the departmental program. English government occupied that spot. The first move to be made was a reversal of this arrangement. Then, in 1921, American government was extended to two semesters. At this stage it was structurally divided, by semesters, between national government, and the governments of the states. The present title of the course, "Government of the United States," illustrates the latest transition, from the structural to the functional approach. Another step forward occurred in the '30s when the department added a seminar which gives its more advanced students an experience at active research into governmental problems, together with an effort at using their materials to find answers to their questions.

Various other revisions could be cited, and on several occasions there have been general over-haulings of the whole arrangement of courses and content. All of this has been toward continuing, or increasing, the usefulness of the department program as the field of political science developed new materials or ideas which it was thought could well fit into the educational scheme of the College. Those who have participated in directing the development of political science at Middlebury have kept in mind the proposition that Middlebury is a liberal arts teaching institution. They have tried, therefore, to take advantage of the greater areas of knowledge steadily becoming available. But, at the same time, they have attempted to avoid the worst, at least, of the evils of over-specialization, both within the department itself and especially by maintaining close contact with the work of the other social sciences. An inspection of the study programs of students who have majored in political science will disclose the fact that such students will have included numerous courses from various of the other departments' offerings, arranged to provide the students with a more meaningful perspective than any one department could create.

One final aspect of change requires comment. This is in regard to the use made of the department by the students. The simplest and most evident change here has been the increase in the numbers of students, an increase referring both to enrollments in courses and to the numbers majoring in political science. There have, of course, been ups and downs, but the general trend is rather steadily upward, to the point where, in the present semester, the department is responsible for 101 student majors—that is, approximately one out of every nine majors in the College. As a related change, it is to be observed that the over-all increase has involved much more than a proportionate increase among the women students, and this is particularly noticeable since the War.

An explanation of all this involves another factor of change, less evident, perhaps, and certainly less easily described: a change in the breadth of interest in political science. Two different influences have been at work here. One is that among American college students, over the past two decades, there has been a sharpened consciousness of, and interest in, problems of government. The other is that political science has become useful as a field of preparation for a wider variety of careers. So, we have a greater number of students who simply are interested in political science, or who feel that the study of man's political organization of himself makes a good core, or base, for a liberal education. And we have not only the pre-law student, as of old, to prepare; but we have those who in increasing numbers are planning a career in government service, local, national, or international; future teachers; and young hopefuls pointing to various other futures. There has been an important increase, in recent years, too, in the numbers of our majors who elect to go on to graduate or professional schools. (It is gratifying to be able to report to you that they experience little difficulty in gaining admission to the good graduate schools, despite present-day congested enrollments, and no difficulty in establishing fine records at such graduate schools.) Indeed, one of the central problems of the present period which we are working at is the maintenance of a reconciliation, of a sound sort, between the extreme demands of a general liberal education and those of technical preparations.

A few words about the faculty who have been involved in the development of the department is in order, in bringing this review to a close. There has been relative stability in respect to the size of the department faculty. There have been several brief occasions in which there was just one man. But it soon became, and regularly was regarded as, a two-man department. Since the College increased in enrollment in the post-war period, some expansion of the department was necessary, and it now has three full-time men and one-third service of another. The department has also been relatively stable as to the incumbency of its chairmanship. Professor Abbott continued in that capacity until his death in 1929, when he was succeeded by Professor Ellsworth B. Cornwall. When Professor Cornwall became chairman of the Vermont Public Service Commission in 1938, and was thereby unable to do more than part-time work at the College, I became chairman and have continued so, except for the interruption of my several years of absence while in the military service.

On the other hand, the department, for one reason and another, has experienced a very high turnover of faculty members other than the chairmen, and this has been true throughout its record. In its thirty-six years, besides the individuals who were chairman at any given time, it has had the full- or part-time teaching services of seventeen faculty members. To some extent this situation will tend to continue. The department is at present operating on a policy of hiring as its third member young men who have partially completed their graduate study and who wish to teach for a year or two before securing their final degree. From the department viewpoint this, of course, means a fairly frequent rotation of personnel.

Those of you who have not recently been on the campus will, no doubt, be interested in knowing something about our present staff. Dr. C. Leonard Hoag, now in his third year at Middlebury, holds the rank of associate professor. His doctorate was earned at Clark University, with his principal work being done in the field of international affairs. During the War, and for a time afterward, he was engaged in opinion research work. He teaches the courses on American foreign policy, American politics and legislation, and the Far East, and participates in conducting the senior seminar. Mr. S. H. Eimerl joined the department this semester as an instructor. He is British, a graduate of Oxford University, and served during the War as an officer in the Royal Navy. He spent last year at Rice Institute, in Houston, Texas, working on his M.A. degree and expects to earn a doctorate subsequent to his work here. He teaches the course on political theory and conducts the discussion sections in the American government course. In addition to these full-time members, the department has the service of Professor Waldo Heinrichs, of the Contemporary Civilization Department, for the course on international relations. As for myself, I give the lectures in the American government course and teach the courses on American local government, comparative government, administration, and constitutional law, and participate in the conduct of the seminar.

gymnasium, ski slopes, playing field, to competent teachers, and promising young men and women of their own age, to all the wide world about them and to the great records of the past—and bids the students make the most of them, and of themselves.

"It does this," concluded President Stratton "in the confident expectation that their training at Middlebury College will fit them in their own life to fulfill their capabilities and to recognize and discharge their obligations to their fellow man and the society in which they live."

was the third annual affair held on our beautiful athletic field. Four Middlebury teams met the visitors. Then the winners played winners, and losers played losers, thus allowing each team to play two games. After the games a supper was served for one-hundred and twenty in Forest Recreation Room. This year the visitors were welcomed at and allowed to dress in McCullough Gymnasium. Other years they had to dress in dormitories all over the campus. Middlebury was very proud of the facilities offered this year.

Skidmore brought up two students for golf. On my way to the gym I met them coming back from the course, and I asked one of our players how they came out. "Oh, we had a wonderful time," she replied. "But how did you come out?" I asked. "Oh, I guess we won," was the answer. Her reply is typical of the spirit of Middlebury girls in sports. It is the fun of the game and not who wins that is important, although Middlebury has actually won in the Play Days held here. The social side of these Play Days is important, and meeting girls from other colleges, listening to their songs, and exchanging ideas are very worth while.

With the use of the gym on Saturday afternoons, it is possible to hold basketball clinics for high schools. One has been held already with participating representatives from the high schools of Proctor, Bristol, Pittsford, Vergennes, and Middlebury. A demonstration of fouls was given by Middlebury College girls, and the interpretation of rule changes was discussed by coaches and players. In this way better coaching results and standards are raised.

Middlebury is also taking the lead in trying to establish a Rating Board for Women Officials in the state so that girls' games will no longer have men officials. The examinations, both written and practical, will be held in McCullough Gymnasium in the near future.

McCullough Gymnasium is still the center of social life on the campus, and many weekend dances and parties are held there, thus continuing its long established service to the College.

GENERAL CATALOGUE

brings together the Middlebury College family in one handsomely bound volume. Thumbnail sketches of over 9700 Alumni-ae are supplemented by data on officers, faculty, and trustees. The Alumni-ae listing begins with the first commencement in 1802 and goes through to include a roster of the Class of 1948. Graduates and non-graduates are not segregated in the listing. At $6.50 the General Catalogue is priced far below what a book similar in quality would cost in the current book market.
